

When ink particles are sparsely and superficially placed in the skin, macrophages of the immune system can break them down and remove them easily.
The microscopic sanitation crew found the delicate shading far easier to sweep away.