

High-volume conventions create short demand spikes without proving that permanent local studio demand has grown.

Building an extra moat for temporary guests leaves vast expanses of empty water after they depart.