

The body treats uncooperative foreign objects like splinters and slowly pushes them toward the skin surface.

The great migration continues.