

Immune cells called macrophages engulf pigment particles and physically shuttle them away from the injection site.
The body operates a free shuttle service.