

Frequent and thorough handwashing remains the primary defense against transferring transient microorganisms to a vulnerable puncture wound.

Filth is remarkably persistent when actively invited.