

Stricter European chemical restrictions frequently become the default global manufacturing standard.

The continent sneezes and the rest of the world immediately redesigns their handkerchiefs.