

Tattoo permanence relies on a continuous cycle where dying immune cells release pigment particles for newly arriving immune cells to capture.

The generational inheritance of the ink eaters continues.