

Wounds left entirely dry form rigid crusts that crack upon movement and delay cellular regeneration.
The ancient art of doing absolutely nothing is deeply flawed.