

Surgical stainless steel contains high proportions of nickel and relies on fragile surface layers for safety.
Thin trench coats make poor disguises for known troublemakers.