

Stainless steel releases substantially more nickel when exposed to blood plasma than when exposed to ordinary sweat. The jump from sweaty gigs to minor scrapes reveals the true nature of cheap alloys.