

Surgical steel alloys contain nickel as an intentional structural component to provide corrosion resistance.
Extracting core metallurgical ingredients usually leaves a rather noticeable void.